The application was first released in 2007 and is based on .NET Framework 1.1. A tube type heat exchanger including fins for use in a car air conditioner or the like can be made to have a plurality of sets of tubes and fins in combination and to be formed as a core member from an aluminium plate or the like, and then have its tubes and fins brazed together to form a heat exchanger. The fins have a groove along one end thereof and a projection along the other end thereof and are positioned in a manner such that the projections engage with the groove, thereby making it possible to perform a brazing by means of a solder applied to the groove as disclosed, for example, in Japanese Utility Model Unexamined Publication No. Sho. 62-41188. In a core member having such fins, the groove is preferably positioned such that the width of the groove is small to thereby make it possible to secure a sufficient strength of the fins, and at the same time, the width of the fin is made to be large to thereby increase the heat transfer efficiency. FIG. 3 of the accompanying drawings shows a conventional brazing core member which includes a plurality of fins arranged in parallel to each other, and FIG. 4 of the accompanying drawings shows one fin (fin 7) of the core member of FIG. 3 in detail. In the core member of FIG. 3, a groove 8 is formed in the heat transfer surface of the fin 7 along the side edge thereof to form a brazing fin 7a, which has a projection 8a at the lower end thereof. The core member of FIG. 3 also includes fins 9a, 9b and 9c arranged in parallel with each other, which are formed at upper ends of the fins 7 and 8 in a manner such that the respective fins are positioned with respect to each other, and each fin has a projection 9a, 9b or 9c at a lower end thereof. The projection 9a, 9b or 9c is formed

For the past several years I have been working for a large retail company in a leadership capacity. Some of the associates have children that come into the store unruly or cause a disturbance. We want to discourage this and I have a few ideas that we could use. I was wondering if there are any ways I could help create a sense of security for both the children and the associates in the store. I would appreciate any insight you can offer. This is a tricky subject that I haven't been in the situation where it has happened yet, but I do know that when we had our son, this was one of the things that really worried me. I had no idea what to do and I tried to teach him some things, but my little boy is very different. He's so young now, I'm not sure if he would even remember what I taught him, but I will try to answer your question. I wouldn't try to "discipline" your son. I'd just teach him that he needs to be a little more "respectful" and watch his language. He probably shouldn't start out by yelling at you either, you might scare him. If he starts to get out of control, run over to one of the managers or ask the associate if they can help you. If it continues, you may need to tell the associate that you have called the police or security and they should know what to do. It's not a good idea to discipline someone your own child. Don't use physical punishment, if you do, you risk frightening your son or daughter and teaching them how not to be afraid to take a stand for themselves. If you make physical punishment the way to get things done, you end up making the problem worse and raising a bad child. I also think it is very hard for adults to be tough with children who feel like they are younger than them. So, I think it is better to teach your child to be responsible and take care of their actions instead of punishing them. (DAGREEN) In other words... treat the child like an adult. And if you can't do that, the last thing to do is get on your supervisor's case. You
